Halloween Safety Tips for Your Pets

You want Halloween to be a fun and safe experience for the whole family, including your pets. So keep these tips in mind:

- Dogs can be easily excited by Halloween commotion and a dog bite or lost dog will quickly end the evening of fun. Opening the door for trick-or-treaters creates escape opportunities so keep a watchful eye on your dogs. Also make sure all of your pets are wearing tags with current ID.
- Decorations can be dangerous, so keep them safely away from pets. For example, candle flames can set fire to a pet's fur and hanging or dangling decorations can be an entanglement or choking hazard to some animals. Use fake cobwebs sparingly. Pets can choke on fake cobwebs used indoors; used outdoors, these cobwebs may pose a risk to birds and other wildlife.
- Keep candy out of your pets' reach. Not only is chocolate dangerous, but xylitol (a sweetener used in candy and gum) can also be toxic. While not all candy is harmful to pets, large ingestions of sugar and fat in candy can lead to pancreatitis. Raisins are also highly toxic to dogs and can cause kidney failure. What's more, candy wrappers can be as more dangerous than the candy itself. Foil and cellophane can cause bowel obstructions that may require surgery.

All of us at WIN wish you a "scary good" Halloween!

Warning Signs Your Computer Might Be Infected With a Virus

If you think the common cold spreads quickly, consider today's computer viruses. They're more sophisticated and malicious than ever, able to attack computers around the world with alarming speed. So to keep your computer healthy, learn to recognize the top symptoms of a computer virus:

Frequent Pop-ups One common pop-up these days warns in alarming fashion that your computer might be infected with a virus and includes an offer of "free" software to address the problem. Don't take the bait! If you do, you'll only download additional malware onto your computer.

Messages You Didn't Send A popular technique for hackers is to essentially hijack your email or social media accounts and send malware-laced messages to your contacts, effectively spreading their virus through attachments and links. Monitor your "Sent Messages" file and social media posts. If you see a message that didn't come from you, or acquaintances report receiving emails that you didn't send, run your antivirus software and change the password to your account.

Lockdown Warning Also called "ransomware," these messages come in a variety of forms. They may be official-looking notifications that your computer has been locked down due to illegal activity and a fine has been assessed, or simple ransom notes indicating that someone has taken control of your computer and you'll have to pay to get it back. Whatever the demand, do not respond.

Crashing, Freezing, or Sluggish Operation Like a human body afflicted with a virus, an infected computer can be sluggish and "sick." Frequent system crashes, frozen screens, and snail's pace operation all indicate a problem. It could be just a configuration issue that's easily remedied. If that's the case, you've probably noticed the problem worsening over time. But if these glitches appear suddenly, malicious software could be the culprit.

Every PC and Mac needs powerful security software running daily to catch malware in hiding, as well as a watchful operator. A virus can wreck havoc on your computer system and compromise your personal information. So stay alert, or you'll be sick with regret!

WIN offers the automatic computer protection of SecureIt Plus. Call 618-662-3636 for details on this easy and affordable antivirus solution.
